Dear Mr. Hilliard,

Baker provided a number of self-contradictory attestations none of which is new. I went into them in books published more than two decades ago. The Commission could get away with pretending he is credible when it knew he is not. The critics could do no more than point out that he is not credible and that we just about all did do.

If you were really familiar with what we published you would have been aware of what is even more destructive of the official solution.

The problem is not bringing information to light. It is getting any attention paid where paying attention might make a difference.

Sincerely,

Harold Weisberg
